

Student Too Sleepy From Big Lunch

Story by Johnny Dunn

After consuming a larger lunch than normal at the bottom of Lenoir before class on Thursday, freshman Kathy Adams found herself sleepy and unable to focus on her studies.

"I was like, so tired that I couldn't pay attention the whole time," recounted Adams. "I mean, I figured that eating would actually give me the energy to stay awake, you know?"

Adams ordered twelve chicken nuggets from Chick-Fil-A, the largest number of nuggets you can order in one box. She soon thereafter experienced a crash so severe that she fell asleep within twenty minutes of the beginning of her chemistry class.

"I, like, never get that many chicken nuggets. Usually I just get fries or something, but I didn't have any breakfast that morning. Looking back I probably should have gotten half that many."

Unfortunately for Adams, this was the day the her professor was reviewing stoichiometry, a subject in which she was already at a disadvantage considering that she didn't know what it was. This only compounded Kathy's culinary remorse.

"I can't believe that the day he goes over the one tiny thing I haven't mastered yet, I'm too tired to pay attention. I'm super mad, because as I was leaving, I heard some girls talking about how helpful the lecture was, and how they totally get it now. Ugh, my life."

From now on, Adams stated, she plans to eat perhaps a light yogurt or fruit medley in order to secure a stable energy level and avoid another mildly unfortunate experience. ●
